Landscape Architecture in times of climate change conference

Changing climate of our planet is a common phenomenon. Scientists are alerting us not because of the changes themselves but because of its rapid progress and lack of adapting cities to approaching conditions. Climate change means not only extreme weather conditions, it is also an economic problem, that forces reorganisation of managing natural resources and processes of administering public spaces.

All these challenges concern landscape architecture, that should face them not only knowingly but also modernly. As part of the conference, three key issues for adapting landscapes to climate change: biodiversity, rainwater management and minimizing the nuisance of high temperatures.

ELCA has met many members of the Polish association. There was also a national members meeting during the event and ELCA could meet the members of the board as well.
